

GLOBAL JOURNAL OF HUMAN-SOCIAL SCIENCE: C

SOCIOLOGY & CULTURE

Volume 22 Issue 2 Version 1.0 Year 2022

Type: Double Blind Peer Reviewed International Research Journal

Publisher: Global Journals

Online ISSN: 2249-460X & Print ISSN: 0975-587X

The Interplay of Ubuntu and Hospitality as Defining Tenets in African and South African Ethics: A Christian Ethics Reflection

By Clement Kholopa

Abstract- The notion of Ubuntu as a moral theory in the South African and African contexts, presents attractive norms of an African world view that can be articulated and applied to contemporary Christian ethics. The proponents of Ubuntu perceive it as an African philosophy based on the maxim, 'a person is a person through other persons', whereby the community prevails over individual considerations. It is not merely an empirical claim that our survival or well-being is causally dependent on others but is in essence capturing a normative account of what we ought to most value in life. The shortcomings of Ubuntu should not preclude from reflecting on Ubuntu as a natural ethic potential that enforces and engenders hospitality, neighbourliness and care for all humanity. In this instance, Ubuntu should shift to liminal Ubuntu with Christ as a bond as Ubuntu seeks to restore African communal cultural behaviours. Hospitality should be practiced by doing or reflecting on things which might look insignificant such as, supporting the vulnerable, the marginalized and the migrants that come to South Africa from the neighbouring African countries that bear the brunt of xenophobic acts. This article seeks to appeal to the predominant influence of Ubuntu and Judeo-Christian ethos embedded in the South African psyche to the challenge posed by xenophobia. The article further argues for human dignity as understood by identifying and exhibiting solidarity with others.

GJHSS-C Classification: DDC Code: 005.432 LCC Code: QA76.76.O63

THE INTERPLAY OF UNTU AND HOSPITALITY AS DEFINING TENETS IN AFRICAN AND SOUTH AFRICAN ETHICS A CHRISTIAN ETHICS REFLECTION

Strictly as per the compliance and regulations of:

The Interplay of Ubuntu and Hospitality as Defining Tenets in African and South African Ethics: A Christian Ethics Reflection

Clement Kholopa

Abstract- The notion of Ubuntu as a moral theory in the South African and African contexts, presents attractive norms of an African world view that can be articulated and applied to contemporary Christian ethics. The proponents of Ubuntu perceive it as an African philosophy based on the maxim, 'a person is a person through other persons', whereby the community prevails over individual considerations. It is not merely an empirical claim that our survival or well-being is causally dependent on others but is in essence capturing a normative account of what we ought to most value in life. The shortcomings of Ubuntu should not preclude from reflecting on Ubuntu as a natural ethic potential that enforces and engenders hospitality, neighbourliness and care for all humanity. In this instance, Ubuntu should shift to liminal Ubuntu with Christ as a bond as Ubuntu seeks to restore African communal cultural behaviours. Hospitality should be practiced by doing or reflecting on things which might look insignificant such as, supporting the vulnerable, the marginalized and the migrants that come to South Africa from the neighbouring African countries that bear the brunt of xenophobic acts. This article seeks to appeal to the predominant influence of Ubuntu and Judeo-Christian ethos embedded in the South African psyche to the challenge posed by xenophobia. The article further argues for human dignity as understood by identifying and exhibiting solidarity with others.

I. INTRODUCTION

This article will explore the notion of Ubuntu with hospitality as its central tenet, as deeply imbedded in African ethics' perspectives of contemporary moral theorists that is largely shaped by the world views of the indigenous black peoples of sub-Saharan Africa, excluding those of Arab, Indian and European descent and culture. The world views of the indigenous people of sub-Saharan Africa have recently, especially in the past five years or so, been compared and contrasted with Western philosophy, with the maxim often associated with Ubuntu being: 'A person is a person through other persons' (Tutu, 1999, 35; Khoza, 1994, 3), notwithstanding that, there has been no rigorous engagements between the two. This has led to what Wiredu (2016:80) has observed, that when he reads Western philosophy, he reads it to see what he can learn from it, but he is of the opinion that we have not reached a stage where somebody will look at African philosophy and readily say: what can I learn from it?

Therefore, a brief comparison will be undertaken to conceptualise and understand the notion of Ubuntu as a moral theory for the purposes of the study. It is in this context that the more analytical and critical approaches to the attractive norms of an African world view will be articulated and applied to contemporary Christian ethics, to develop and defend Ubuntu as a deeply moral principle (Tutu, 1999; Ramose, 1999; Shutte, 1993, 2001; Metz, 2007, 2011; Magezi, 2017; Meylahn, 2017).

Author: e-mail: clement.kholopa1@gmail.com

II. THE NATURE AND HISTORY OF THE NOTION UBUNTU

The scholarship on Ubuntu, the Nguni word often used as an ethic or philosophy-based concept on communal relationships that grew out of traditional sub-Saharan lifestyles, has attracted diverse academic approaches in the 21st century (Metz, 2014:447). Ubuntu in its literal translation from the African Nguni linguistic group (ie Zulu, Xhosa, Ndebele and Swati), means humaneness, hence, it is common for traditional black people on the continent to believe one's aim in life is to exhibit Ubuntu (different linguistic groups have their own corresponding meaning for the term) by prizes communal relationships with other people. The substantial anthology devoted to the work in African ethics began with the classic but somewhat dated texts by Placide Tempels (1959) and John Mbiti (1969) (Metz, 2017: 62). However, these classic texts from Tempels and Mbiti were mainly used by sub-Saharan ethicists as a matter of moral anthropology in an attempt to shape indigenous morality to address their own interpretations of the world.

Tempels (1959:18, 30) acknowledges that all behaviour depends on a system of principles and for Africans (Bantu) according to Tempels, that system of principles, has a different conception of relationships between people, of causality and responsibility contrary to the one held in European thought. He postulated that the fundamental concept of African ontology is centred in a single value, which he termed 'vital force', that denotes the integrity of the whole being and which is not used exclusively in the bodily sense (ibid., 44-45). Therefore, he posits that 'muntu' signifies the vital force that is endowed with intelligence and will in African ontology as espoused in the interpretation of the African saying 'Vidye i muntu mukatampe': meaning "God is the great Person", alluding that He is the great, powerful and reasonable living force. Therefore, for Tempels, the philosophy of forces in the theory of life is the guiding principle in the motivation for all African customs that decrees the norms in which personality in the individual shall be kept unaltered or allowed to develop (ibid., 74).

He (Tempels) further posits that 'objective morality to the African is ontological, immanent and intrinsic morality' as their moral standards are essentially dependent on things ontologically understood (ibid., 120-121). The knowledge to discern the natural order of forces is informed by their natural intelligence and by their philosophical notions of the relationships and interactions between things. Thus, Tempels concluded that an act or usage will be described as 'ontologically good' by the African and will be similarly accounted as 'ethically good'; therefore, by deductive extension, be evaluated as 'juridically just' (ibid., 121). The knowledge of an individual's moral duty and legal obligations is bound to the pain of losing their vital force, as they know that by carrying out their duties, they will enhance the quality of their being. It is therefore important for the 'muntu' to live life in accordance with their vital rank in the community, to make a meaningful contribution to its well-being and maintenance by the normal exercise of their favourable vital influence. This not only exists for members of their community but has to be extended to outsiders as they are equally God's people; and their vital force has to be respected, as the destruction or diminution of an outsider's life is tantamount to the disturbance of the ontological order and the subsequent repercussions thereof (ibid., 136).

According to Tempels (ibid. 142-143), evil is conceived by Africans as an injustice towards God and directed towards the natural order which is the expression of His will; and it is also seen as directed to the ancestors in an attempt to act against their vital rank. Accordingly, every injustice is an attempt on the life of a person, whether belonging to the community or a foreigner, of which the attendant malice in it proceeds from the great respect due to human life, the supreme gift from God. Thus, for Africans, real injustice is the harm done to the vital force which accords restitution based in terms of the worth of life, which will serve as the basis of assessment of the damages or compensation. Tempels concluded that the inherent principle in African philosophy is the vital force, with the preservation of the vital force the all-consuming and motivating aim that guides and motivates all their practices (ibid., 179).

The seminal work of Mbiti (1969), 'African religions and philosophy', set a new intellectual climate for understanding African social and cultural studies from their own norms, internal rules, and within the logic of their own systems. According to Mbiti (1969:1), Africans are notoriously religious with each person having their own set of beliefs and practices, as religion permeates each facet of their everyday life. Through his comprehensive anthropological study of the African traditional concept of God, he concluded that the ontological expression of God for all these people was that He is the origin and Sustainer of all things, the Supreme Being (ibid., 29). For Africans, God is simultaneously transcendent and immanent, therefore a balanced understanding of these two extremes is necessary for the discussions concerning African conceptions of God. The knowledge of God by Africans emanates from expressions about Him in proverbs, songs, prayers, names, myths, stories, short statements and religious ceremonies (ibid., 29).

Mbiti contends that (ibid., 29-38) for Africans, their concepts of God are shaped by the historical, geographical, social and cultural background or environment of each person. This explains the similarities and differences when considering their beliefs about God throughout the continent. Their attributes of God for an African are difficult to grasp and express, since they pertain more to the realm of the abstract than concrete thought forms, albeit, African thought forms are broadly speaking more concrete than abstract. Therefore, many African societies consider God to be omniscient, omnipresent and omnipotent in that He knows all things, He is simultaneously everywhere, and almighty. Thus, in a similar vein, God is considered to be merciful, shows kindness and takes pity on mankind by averting calamities, supplying rain and providing fertility to people, animals and plants.

Mbiti (ibid., 108. 204-215) observed that:

in traditional life the individual does not and cannot exist alone except corporately. He owes his existence to other people, including those of past generations and his contemporaries. He is simply part of the whole. This community must therefore make, create or produce the individual; for the individual depends on the corporate group.

The sense of corporate relationship is so deep and perverse that the solidarity of the community must be maintained, otherwise there is disintegration and destruction, and this must be avoided at all cost as this order is primarily conceived of in terms of a kinship relationship. According to Mbiti, most African peoples accept or acknowledge that God is the final arbiter of all moral and ethical codes as well as the final guardian of law and order, therefore, the breaking of such an order either by the individual or by a group, is tantamount to condemnation by the corporate body of society (ibid., 206).

Mbiti concludes that in African societies one can interpret what constitutes a good character as it pertains to the traditional concepts of 'good' and 'bad' or evil, as it relates to the morals and ethics of any given society. Good character in African ethics shows itself in the following ways: hospitality, generosity, kindness, protecting the poor and weak (especially women and orphans), giving honour and respect to the elderly, with justice, truth and rectitude as essential virtues (ibid., 212). Thus, good character is the propensity to accept and adopt the customs, laws, regulations and taboos that govern conduct in society that obviate, what Mbiti aptly called, a distinction between 'moral evil' and 'natural evil'. 'Moral evil' pertains to what a man does against his fellow man and 'natural evil' is suffering, calamities and accidents wrought upon others through 'natural' causes that are caused by some agent (either human or spiritual) which in African ontology are intricately associated with certain individuals (ibid., 214-215). Finally, Mbiti warns that the dilemma facing African societies rooted in traditional solidarity and yet increasingly being faced with a rapidly changing world, is to search for new values, identities and self-consciousness based on the time-honoured ideas of their forefathers as being 'valuable', 'good' and 'honourable' (ibid., 271).

The texts written by Tempels and Mbiti, while viewed from different perspectives and motivations, take cognisance of traditional African morality that is founded on traditional African ontological reflection (a reflection on being). The texts are written, albeit on different planes of understanding, as a sympathetic and systematic account of the worldviews of a wide array of traditional African peoples, in particular, Mbiti's interpretations on African personhood. However, both authors tend to speak of the beliefs of a particular group of African people; they at least provide an overview of some notable strands of moral thought and practices of sub-Saharan peoples (Metz, 2017:63). Thus, they both shed some light on the discovery of man, of meaning in himself from the reflection on his being and his relation to other beings and how he ought to be. This provided the basis of traditional African morality (Musoke, 2018: 6). Of particular interest to this study about the texts of Tempels and Mbiti, is that the common ground in African thought of the observed societies is traceable to language which is the vehicle for thought, and thought being the originator of culture (Cononici, 1999: 2-3). Therefore, we can advance our discourse by generalising that African thought and culture has common elements on which to base assumptions on African morality, despite the diversity of cultures.

III. THE HISTORICAL DEVELOPMENT OF UBUNTU

The development of Ubuntu was largely influenced and inspired by the context of social transformation of post-colonial Africa whereby leaders in most spheres of life attempted to identify past values that they believed should inspire politics and life in general in the future society (Gade, 2011:304). The advent of Africans gaining sufficient political power post-independence propelled them to attempt to restore their dignity and culture by returning to their traditional, humanist, or socialist values, which has been best represented in recent years by President Thabo Mbeki's propagation of an African Renaissance ideal (Gade, 2011: 305). Therefore, the promotion of African ethics as a field that is systematically studied started properly only in the 1960s with the advent of literacy and the decline of colonialism, as more often than not, African traditions were largely oral, lacking written documentation of ethical practices (Metz, 2017: 62).

Gade (2011:315) opines that the historical development and definition of Ubuntu in "written sources happened during different historical periods" which he (Gade) divided into the period in which Ubuntu was defined as a human quality; the period in which Ubuntu was defined as something either connected to, or identical to, a philosophy or an ethic; the period in which Ubuntu was defined as African humanism; the period in which Ubuntu was defined as a worldview; and the period in which Ubuntu was defined as something connected to the proverb 'umuntu ngumuntu ngabantu'.

These historical periods indicate that much of the initial material mainly recounted the mores of a given sub-Saharan people, with a hint of a typical Western approach, as a desperate need for Africans to overcome the yoke of colonialism and become familiar with African interpretations of the world, particularly those of their own people. This prompted Wiredu (1992) to assert that 'African philosophy must be understood within the context of its emergence with its associative socio-cultural and political milieu'. Therefore, it is reductionist to conceive of African philosophy as merely 'ethonophilosophy' as "the authority of African philosophy is the ability to create meaning for a culturally differentiated society, meanings that are not anachronistic but relevant to the socio-political and economic condition of people" (Eze & Metz, 2016:75).

Hountondji (1995) in his African Philosophy: Myth and Reality, asserts that Africans may learn philosophy in Western institutions of higher learning abroad or at home and become extremely skilful in philosophical disputation and may even make original contributions in the discipline, however, the fact remains that they are not engaged in African philosophy but rather in Western philosophy. Part of the concerns of contemporary African philosophy has been the controversy of Hountondji's critique of ethonophilosophy that has precipitated and constituted a large discourse, nevertheless, there is still a pervasive belief among African philosophers that there were unpublished or unrecorded philosophical texts in traditional African philosophy (Mahaye, 2018). Wiredu (2016) opines that there are basic human questions concerning people that can only be answered by utilising embedded knowledge in their indigenous thought systems of which the study of such philosophical texts by Africans has not been conceptually illuminating nor has it been eminently critical and reconstructive.

These days, one often finds African ethicists wanting to know not only what merits preserving from their tradition, but also what should be taken seriously by those outside it, with more robust arguments and critical approaches (Metz, 2017: 63). Metz (2017: 63) contends that scholarship in African philosophy has evolved with the publication of texts that appeal to deep moral principles from African cultures in order to judge certain common cultural practices to be either matters of mere etiquette or to be downright immoral as evidenced by Wiredu (1996: 61-77) and Gyekye (1997: 242-258). He (Metz) further asserts that there are texts that seek to develop and defend comprehensive African moral philosophies in contrast to utilitarian, Kantian and Aristotelian grand ethical traditions in the West (Bujo, 1997, 2001; Gyekye, 1997; Ramose, 1999; Iroegbu, 2000; Shutte, 2001; Odimegwu, 2008; Metz and Gaie, 2010).

The relationship between Ubuntu and the aphorism associated with it 'umuntu ngumuntu ngabantu' is no coincidence as it was a desire to find something uniquely African in post-apartheid South Africa in an attempt to transform society by incorporating traditions from the past that were deemed to be noble or worthy. This is reinforced by the observation of Louw (2001:15) that

The maxim 'umuntu ngumuntu ngabantu' articulates a basic respect and compassion for others...As such, it is both a factual description and a rule of conduct or social ethic. It not only describes human being as 'being-with-others', but also prescribes how we should relate to others, i.e. what 'being-with-others' should be all about.

The principles of Ubuntu resonate with values of human worth and dignity that are universally acknowledged.

Unsurprisingly, Shutte (1993, 2001) was persuaded by the appeal of Ubuntu as a guiding principle to harness its usefulness as the foundation for moral theory. Metz (2007: 321-341, 2011: 532-559), when responding to critics of Ubuntu as too vague, collectivist and anachronistic, constructed a moral theory of Southern African world views based on the conception of human dignity that is based on the premise that "human beings have a dignity by virtue of their capacity for community, understood as the combination of identifying with others and exhibiting solidarity with them, where human rights violations are egregious degradations of this capacity". The proponents of Ubuntu such as Shutte (2001) and Brodryk (2002) have advocated that Ubuntu should be exported to the rest of the world as Africa's unique gift to humanity (Eliastam, 2015: 2).

IV. THE DEFINITION OF UBUNTU AS A MORAL CONCEPT

Designating the meaning of the term Ubuntu is a problematic and yet tantalising activity as the term resists vigorous exercises to describe it, particularly when interpreted, given the hegemonic, foreign development and civilisation discourse prevailing in the sub-Saharan region (Mawere & van Stam, 2016). What Ubuntu entails is context dependent as the different shades of meaning and presence depend on the geographical, historical, linguistic and other components that weave together the texture and matrix of societies. Ubuntu is well grounded and understood in African communities and is also embedded in their cultures (Gade, 2012:486).

According to Mnyaka and Motlhabi (2015:216), the origins, usage and contextual development of the word Ubuntu has often been vague, ill-defined and amorphous, however, most of the sub-Saharan African populace know the word or its equivalent but are not usually able to define it. During the various stages of written sources of the term from the early 1800s through to the present day, different authors have defined Ubuntu broadly as: a human quality, African humanism, a philosophy, an ethic, and as a world view (Gade, 2011:21). However, African usage reveals Botho/Ubuntu as a significant quality of motho/umuntu and is a person who respects other people (Motlhabi, 1988: 127). Motlhabi and Mnyaka (2005: 217) explain that it is difficult to define Ubuntu precisely. They note that:

Defining an idea like "Ubuntu" is akin to trying to give a definition of "time." Everybody seems to know what "time" is until they are asked to define it or detail its essential characteristic without which "time" could not be "time." This is based on the notion that Ubuntu is something abstract, [a] non-perceptible...quality or attribute of human acts the presence or absence of which can only be intuited by the human mind.

This quality is meant to be acquired by human beings. So "Ubuntu is not only about human acts, it is also about being, it is a disposition, and it concerns values that contribute to the well-being of others and the community" (Mnyaka & Motlhabi, 2005: 217). Mnyaka and Motlhabi are of the opinion that "Ubuntu is not only just accepted human qualities but also the very human essence itself, which points to become Botho/Abantu or humanized beings who have amicable relationships in the community and the society" (ibid.).

The word Ubuntu is derived from Nguni and represents notions of universal human interdependence, solidarity and communalism that can be traced back to small-scale communities in pre-colonial Africa, and mostly underlie every sub-Saharan African culture (Roederer & Moellendorf, 2004:441). The adage 'umuntu ngumuntu ngabantu' (I am a person through other persons) articulates a basic respect and caring for others. It is both a factual description and a social ethic that not only describes an individual as being-with-others, but also prescribes how one should relate to others, that is, it is all about being-with-others (Louw, 2001:15). This places the concept of Ubuntu within the realm of the contemporary Western philosopher Sartre who asserts that being-for-others is the way that places the individual in the state of possessing equal ontological status with the rest of society (Sartre, 1958: 222). It is succinctly expressed as 'no man is an island'. It is therefore unsurprising that Cornell and van Marle (2005:207) posit that Ubuntu is 'an ontic orientation within an interactive ethic'.

These understandings of Ubuntu coincide with some of the modern perspectives of Western philosophy as espoused by Sartre (1958: 370) that being-in-the-world presupposes the existence of the other in that 'others are for me as I am for them, and I enter into relations with them much as they enter into relation with me'. Khoza (1994) views Ubuntu as a world in which people share and treat each other as humans based on the underlying 'universal brotherhood' of Africans. The practising of the concept of Ubuntu thus unlocks the capacity of an African culture that encapsulates and expresses compassion, caring, reciprocity, dignity, humanity and mutuality in the interests of building and maintaining communities based on justice and solidarity (Poovan et al., 2006: 23-25). Thus, Ubuntu practises fairness, compassion and values human dignity that governs communal accountability for life's preservation (Chaplin, 2006: 1).

V. THE CHARACTERISTICS OF UBUNTU AS A MORAL CONCEPT

Msengana (2006:89) views Ubuntu as a social value from the African context which is characterised by relatedness, collectivism, communalism, spiritualism and holism. The relatedness is invoked by the African cultural practices embodied in the principles of Ubuntu that are dependent on interpersonal relations which are the basis of tightly woven societal fabric. Hence, collectivism is at the heart of African culture, which by its nature places the importance of the group above the individual as group success is more valued than that of the individual (Msengana, 2006: 91). Consequently, within the Ubuntu framework the autonomy of an individual is submerged into the community as it is understood and practised in that community (Mnyaka, 2005: 215-37). Mbiti argues that spiritualism is manifested since, "only in terms of other people does the individual become conscious of his own being, his own duties, his privileges and responsibilities towards himself and towards other people" (Mbiti, 1969: 108). Thus, holism is founded on African humanism entrenched in Ubuntu as the universal brotherhood of Africans which can be described as all-encompassing.

Khomba illustrates that practising Ubuntu represents an African conception of human beings and their interactions within the community that encapsulates their social behaviours that define their African ethics (Khomba, 2011:130). However, according to Ng'weshemi (2015:15), "for Africans, one is not human simply by birth. Rather one becomes human through a progressive process of integration into society". This means that human beings are communal beings who cannot be conceived apart from their relationship with others.

According to Sebidi (1998), the collective values of Ubuntu cannot be compromised as Ubuntu is not just an attribute of individual acts that build the community, but a basic human orientation towards one's fellow human beings. The notion of Ubuntu is based on the spirit of hospitality in which people display an unconditional collective hospitality (Msengana, 2006: 92). Ubuntu suggests hospitality and acceptance of fellow human beings in that it guarantees unconditional dignity through fostering the spirit of unconditional collective dignity and respect (Mbigi, 1997:6).

For Lenkabula (2008: 381), the collective consciousness of African people is found through theoretical and practical commitments in community life which is often referred to as communalism. This communalism is understood as the expression of justice, wisdom, intergenerational concern and commitment, characterised by compassion in daily interactions and relations. The traditional African person is a social and community orientated person of whom the community is an embodiment of solidarity with most of the duties being performed by the community. Therefore, the ideal person will be judged by his relationship with others, which can be attributed to his kindness and good character as well as respect and living in harmony with others.

The spirits according to Mbiti (1969: 75) "in general belong to the ontological mode of existence between God and man". In African religions, the spirit is one's total being or soul. In Ubuntu, spirituality is expressed and realised in the manifestation of deeds of compassion, caring, kindness, solidarity and sharing. Hence, these acts produce positive results for the community and the individual (Mnyaka & Motlhabi, 2005:227). It is difficult to discuss the social and religious systems in isolation to each other in the African way of life as they are strongly interrelated. According to Mbigi (1997: 32-33), in both thought and practice, the organisation of African lives is based and influenced by their religious belief either consciously or unconsciously.

The spirit of Ubuntu is of no consequence if it is articulated and perceived in the absence of a collective survival agenda as the solidarity embodied in the collective is born out of kinship culture that is the heart and soul of their existence. It is in this solidarity that when he suffers or rejoices, he does not suffer or rejoice alone but with his kinsmen, his neighbours and relatives whether dead or alive (Mbiti, 1969: 108). Therefore, the spirits are seen to actually define and identify the community, as people need to know who they are before they know what they are to become (Msengana, 2006: 95).

VI. UBUNTU ANTHROPOLOGY

In line with the meaning of Ubuntu, we would like to reflect on Ubuntu anthropology. This enables us to undertake a detailed analysis of Ubuntu anthropology regarding aspects of the culture and personality, political organization and social life of Africans as seen from the perspective of its roots and religion (Kholopa, 2016: 8).

As a result, "this will give us an idea of how and why Ubuntu is often misinterpreted in today's world and how Ubuntu anthropology is in line with culture" (ibid.). Haviland (1990:30) defines Ubuntu anthropological culture as "a set of rules or standards shared by members of a society, which when acted upon by the members, produce behaviours that fall within a range of variation the members consider proper and acceptable", he continues, "whereas, society is a group of people who occupy a specific locality and who share the same cultural traditions". The significant feature of Ubuntu is that people learn from families through integration in the family and community. In order to maintain Ubuntu's anthropological culture, Haviland (1990:28) states that Ubuntu must "satisfy the basic needs of those who live by its rules, (and) provide an orderly existence for the members of a society". Indeed, Ubuntu culture is "the common denominator that brings the actions of the individual intelligible to the community" (Haviland, 1990). Haviland (ibid.) argues that "there cannot be Ubuntu culture without community or society, the two of them are interlinked". Conversely, there cannot be community/society without reflecting on individuals. Accordingly, every community has its own culture that portrays Ubuntu (ibid.).

VII. UBUNTU IN A PLURALISTIC COMMUNITY

Haviland (1990:28) defines the pluralistic society of South Africa as a "society in which there exists a diversity of sub-cultural patterns". He explains that by virtue of the identity of their subcultural dissimilarity different groups are importantly working with different interpretations of regulations. Admittedly, in a diverse plural society such as South Africa, it is not easy to understand the different benchmarks by which different communities function. For instance, South Africa has people from Asia, the Middle East, Northern and Southern Europe and Africans from within the continent. Hence, on the one hand, they may enrich Ubuntu if it is explained and practiced well by the indigenous people, but on the other hand may distort it if Ubuntu is imposed on other communities and may cause distrust among people, and lose the essence and the meaning of Ubuntu and its values in South Africa.

Therefore, building on Ubuntu's anthropological culture, Ubuntu is learned, it is not inherited. It is worth mentioning that for Ubuntu culture to take root, there should be an amicable integration among all cultures in South Africa. However, for South Africans to integrate, they need to reflect not only on behaviours, values and beliefs, but also on the economic, political, and social aspects of cultures and structures that are put in front of them, that is different forms of media, literature or even oral conversation. Therefore, for Ubuntu to provide a valuable contribution to South Africa with the diverse cultures, races and creeds, the people have to reflect on Ubuntu so that it can profoundly unite South Africans and continue to preserve the traditional values as past experiences are linked with the present and future realities (Kholopa, 2016: 8-9).

VIII. UBUNTU AND RELIGION

Africans' understanding and beliefs spring from the world which surrounds them. However, they interpret life given to them by Molimo in Sesotho, and Unkulunkulu in Zulu languages; that is the Highest One, the Supreme Being. Before the Christian missionaries arrived, this Supreme Being, Molimo, had no gender; it was neutral, neither male nor female. Likewise, the Badimo ancestors had no gender; it could mean male or female. Hence people's understanding of life was both natural and supernatural and provided the guidance of how to behave and act (Kholopa, 2016: 42).

Tylor (1990:358) argues that religion is viewed as the belief and model of behaviour by which members manipulate a situation that is beyond their understanding using various prayers, singing and dancing, offering sacrifices etc. Gathogo (2016) sees indigenous religion as a "system of beliefs and practices that are integrated into the culture and worldviews of the African peoples". In the same vein Gathogo (2016) believes that, "every person is born into a specific culture that influences a person's religious pattern". Hence, religion is a necessary tool for the members' ethos and culture. Religion offers people ethical values and guides them to hope and provides solutions for people to lead harmonious lives; that is to say, it regulates between right and wrong and nourishes one's spiritual hunger through rituals like meditation, ceremonies and devotions.

Ubuntu's foundation can be traced to both culture and religion. Seemingly both culture and religion influence each other, just as Ubuntu has elements of cultural-religious aspects, so Christianity has its Judeo-Roman influences. However, religion also influences politics since human beings are social beings and the organisation of communities is understood as part of the foundation of life. Berger and Buttmer (1976:29) argue that "it has been seen throughout human history that the maintenance of the community has been the role of religion". I argue that the Africans knew God/the Supreme Being before Christianity arrived in both South Africa and the whole African continent. Indeed, Christianity is a recent religion in South Africa. Mofokeng (1988:38) argues that, "when the white man came to our country, he had the Bible and we [Blacks] had the land. The white man said to us 'let us pray'. After the prayer, the white man had the land and we had the Bible".

This then is how the Christian religion was received and embraced. The above anecdote may, however, have different interpretations. Thus, West (2016:143) interprets it using three arguments: Firstly, the Bible is an integral part of a continual process of colonization, regional oppression and exploitation; secondly, Africans acknowledged the unclear contradiction of being colonized by a Christian people and accepting their ideological philosophy; and thirdly, blacks themselves convey commitment in accepting it and passing it on to the next generation. Hence, black South Africans had no problem with the Good News, however, they did have problems with the ideological interpretation of the Bible of the colonisers and missionaries (cited in Kholopa, 2016).

Msafiri (2002: 86-87) opines that within the New Testament, there are many family metaphors that reflect the relationship between the human community and the Church. Similarly, Paul upholds the Church community as a "household of God" (1 Timothy 3: 15). He goes further to say believers are "part of God's household" (Ephesians 2: 19-22). Thus, there are many references in the New Testament that refer to families that signify the beginning of communities, such as the household metaphor in Acts 11:14; 16:15, Colossians 3: 18-21, Romans 16: 3-5 and 1 Corinthians 16: 19. However, these communities were not perfect, just like African communities, but they held together clinging onto their similarities rather than their differences.

Do we find some similarities with biblical communitarianism? There are certainly many instances that indicate identical communal aspects in both Ubuntu and the Bible. The first correlation is in the gospels. These are narratives describing Jesus with his disciples forming a community. For instance, in the Sermon on the Mount, Jesus says, blessed are the poor in spirit...peacemakers..., (Matthew 5: 1-12). On the one hand, there are many places in the gospel where Jesus is with different communities, such as at Cana, and at Caesarea Philippi. Ela (1988:10) posits that there is evidence of communal dialogues, by and through African oral tradition, conversing and listening and passing on values to the future generation through rituals, ceremonies and purifications. Hence, the communication between Jesus and his early followers could be a form of socio-cultural structure and Jesus opened a mutual path leading to the formation of a community (ibid.).

Secondly, the early Christian community was formed when Jesus gathered disciples together in different places; on the hillside, on a boat, on the seashore. Hence, there is a resemblance between how the early Ubuntu community gathered in the past and still gathers today, in some places, under a tree. The people are still connected to nature when they go to the mountains, or the seashore to reflect on God speaking to them. One could say it is one of the best ways to be in tune with God and the present world (Ela, 1988, 11). Thirdly, we observe Jesus' concern, not only for the particular needs of his region, but also the entire universe. He does not want to deprive anyone, since there is an invitation to every individual to belong to and to participate in the community he founded. Hence, he postulates the great mission by sending his disciples to go out and make many more communities of believers, to heal and baptize them (Matthew 28: 19-20). Similarly, Ubuntu commenced with family clans and slowly expanded and planted its values in people's hearts. "A person becomes a person through or because of another person" (Gade, 2012: 486).

IX. UBUNTU AS A MORAL THEORY IN SOUTH AFRICA

Ideas associated with Ubuntu are often deemed inappropriate for public morality in today's South Africa as they are perceived to be too vague, anachronistic and collectivist (Metz, 2011: 532). We will proceed with the notion of Ubuntu as a moral theory, since it is not the purpose nor the scope of this study to engage in the nuances or ramifications of the claims that Ubuntu is too vague, anachronistic and collectivist. According to Metz (2011: 536) "a moral theory is roughly a principle purporting to indicate, by appeal to as few properties as possible, what all right actions have in common as distinct from wrong ones". Therefore, in contrast to the Western moral theories (ie utilitarianism and Kantianism) we appeal to the ubiquitous aphorism 'A person is a person through other persons', 'Umuntu ngumuntu ngabantu' in Nguni and 'Motho ke motho ka batho babang' in Sotho-Setswana. This aphorism to the Nguni or Sotho person is not merely an empirical claim that our survival or well-being are causally dependent on others but is in essence capturing a normative account of what we ought to most value in life (Metz, 2011:537). This is viewed by Shutte (2001:2) as an embodiment of an understanding of what it is to be human, what is necessary for human beings to grow and find fulfilment, and an expression of a vision of what is valuable and worthwhile in life.

Shutte (2001:2) opines that Ubuntu morality is rooted in the history of Africa and is at the heart of most South African cultures while its values are not just African but universal. Shutte (2001:30) further sums it up, thus:

Our deepest moral obligation is to become fully human. And this means entering more and more deeply into community with others. So, although the goal is personal fulfilment, selfishness is excluded.

"African moral ideas are both more attractively and more accurately interpreted as conceiving of communal relationships as an objectively-desirable kind of interaction that should guide what majorities want and which norms become dominant" (Metz, 2011:538). Metz (ibid.) asserts that there are two recurrent themes in typical African discussion of the nature of community as an ideal, which he calls identity and solidarity. By identity, Metz (2007:335) refers to identify with each other whereby people think of themselves as members of the same group, and to conceive of themselves as 'we'. This entails people taking pride or feeling shame in the group's activities. For people to exhibit solidarity means to engage in mutual aid and to act in ways that are reasonably beneficial to each other. Metz (2007: 337) further states that while identity and solidarity are conceptually separable and logically distinct, in African thought they are viewed morally to be together. They indicate communal relationship with other human beings. Thus, solidarity and identity are to an extent conferred by Ubuntu. Thus, solidarity and identity are viewed as central definitive tenets or elements of Ubuntu.

There is a shift to liminal Ubuntu as espoused by Magezi (2017:116), which entails Christ as the bond for all humanity. The Christ bond promotes inclusiveness, responsibility and moral duty, values, and accountability to public structures among others. It entails transcending the boundary of community and relationship that is often defined by blood relationship and geographical location in popular and general Ubuntu discussion. This view of society is reinforced by Mbiti (1969:12) that Africans are found both in Ubuntu philosophy and in religion, and "that anything that threatens Africans would seem to threaten their whole existence". Bujo (2001:2) further explains that Africans tend in practice to speak about human beings rather than God. This is because one who pays heed to the dignity of the human person also pleases God and that one who acts against the human person offends precisely this God. It therefore follows that the ethical conduct is not only based on the individual but on a relational network that is equally anthropocentric, cosmic and theocentric.

Tutu (2009:24) notes that Ubuntu is a theological notion. As a theological notion, it enlightens our humanity's worthiness which is intrinsic to what we do and who we are, because we are created in the imago Dei. Furthermore, Meylahn (2017:123) states that Ubuntu theories are developed from oral traditions of African practices but shaped and informed by Western heritage. It is therefore unsurprising that Ubuntu is interpreted in Christian language and permeated by its texts thus becoming very difficult to differentiate from certain Christian interpretations. The conception of community in terms of sharing a way of life and exhibiting solidarity towards others is naturally understood in terms of caring about their quality of life. This is the broad sense of 'friendship' (or even 'love') that is at the heart of the morality of Southern African culture as it pertains to interpersonal relationships (Metz, 2011:539). This is summed-up by Tutu (1999:35):

Harmony, friendliness, community are great goods. Social harmony is the summum bonum – the greatest good. Anything that subverts or undermines this sought-after good is to be avoided like the plague.

A person is socialised to think of himself as inextricably bound to others as Ubuntu promotes the spirit of selflessness as espoused in the scriptures.

X. CONCERN ABOUT UBUNTU AS A MORAL CONCEPT

Ubuntu, as with all moral values, has its own gradation system and ethical standards that allows its practitioners to make value judgements, even when it refers to moral obligations towards other people. Enslin and Horsthemke (2004) argue that Ubuntu does not offer practical guidance for ills plaguing Africa. It does not offer solutions to Africa's problems such as the prevalence of autocratic rule, corruption, sexism, homophobia and xenophobia. I argue that our personhood, by virtue of Ubuntu, accompanies moral responsibility and ethical demands. We therefore ought to understand our responsibility to those who are marginalised/deprived in society and lacking material goods. It becomes a shared identity of a total personhood of Ubuntu philosophy (Ogude, 2018:5).

Cornell and Van Merle (2005:196) acknowledge that Ubuntu once had social value, but it bears no relevance to the current situation, especially for the youth of South Africa. Some have argued that it is patriarchal and conservative, and its usefulness has been eroded by its vagueness and its ability to accommodate a range of meanings. Matolino and Kwindwingi (2013: 197-2005) assert that it is an outdated notion that does not have the capacity to shape the ethics in the current South African context as it is not suited to the social and ethical challenges of the present-day situation, notwithstanding that there is no fault with the ideal of Ubuntu itself. Furthermore, they argue that Ubuntu does not treat all people equally since it is a cultural system that relegates women to a lower status, especially when it refers to the regulation of customary marriages, access to land and inheritance rights.

Louw (2001: 15-36) points out that Ubuntu is characterised by tribal conformity to group loyalty, which when interpreted in a narrow or ethnic fashion becomes corrupted. Thus, in a post-apartheid context it has been reduced to a form of nepotism, and a system of patronage that is used to pursue power and money (Naude, 2013: 246). This is especially evident from the dilemma of Ubuntu's philosophy which is expressed in the provision of assistance to 'our people' who may well be a range of people close to us, and the obvious danger of choosing the criteria determining who are 'our people' and 'who is not one of us' (Gathogo, 2008: 47). It therefore leads one to legitimately question the existence or social value of Ubuntu in the face of the incidence of rape, murder, child rape and violent acts of xenophobia, corruption and nepotism in South Africa.

XI. THE UNDERSTANDING OF HOSPITALITY

For Hernandez (2015:93) hospitality means, "primarily the creation of a free space where the stranger can enter and become a friend instead of an enemy. Hospitality is not to change people, but to offer them space where change can take place". Indeed, it clearly elaborates that it is an offer and it renders unconditional respect and awarding an honour that empowers others as they certainly deserve the respect due to their dignity having been made in the likeness of God. It is certainly true that "no guest will ever feel welcome when his/her host is not at home in his/her own house". Likewise, no healthy relationship can develop when the community members reach out to others from their forlorn situation, because it can have a destructive result in the long run.

The community becomes a wounded healer, and we argue that it is not only hospitality that is changed in the community, but in addition, the community can become a healing community where pain and broken hearts become avenues for a new vision of sacrifice and love (Kholopa, 2016, 68). Certainly, "the South African community must learn to let things go so that the spirit of love and forgiveness can fill people's hearts for them to learn to accept others" (ibid.). Gooden and Wooldridge (2011:248) assert that "to accept others requires a commitment that might cause one to tolerate and take affirmative action to make the difference in the country".

How can members overcome the problem that easily arises and leads members to view others as strangers and threats? How can South Africans build a hospitable community so that this hospitality is not just a facade but a communal representation of life together in Christ? Hospitality should be practiced by doing or reflecting on things which might look insignificant, for instance supporting the vulnerable, the poor, the marginalized, and the immigrants that flock to the country from the neighbouring countries and from abroad (Kholopa, 2016:68). However, such simple gestures, although they may appear insignificant, can make the difference in the new South Africa. This is because one's individual example of such hospitality can expand to cover the whole community. It is true that love breeds generosity and mercy which leads in turn to hospitality. I argue that in order to be hospitable the members must acquire a sense of generosity by doing good to others and welcoming foreigners, since our fathers too were foreigners who were exiled during the Apartheid era (ibid.).

Developing the attitude of sharing and of being with others, not necessarily of the same tribe or culture, but also those different from them, can make the difference (Kholopa, 2016). Newman (2007:183) explains that "“being with” fits with our understanding of worship itself as hospitality, in worship we are welcomed and received, through Christ and the Spirit, into God’s triune communion, God’s desire to be with us, God gathers us". She emphasizes the point that South Africans must reciprocate that desire to be concerned with other nationals.

A Christian response in appreciation to God is to create service (work) for those who have nothing. Hence, there is a need to cooperate with God in order to serve the needs of others, to rebuild the country in a more hospitable manner which is conducive to the contract made by God and the human community. God does not accept people manipulating other human beings who do not possess the economic means for their own survival. He enjoys the human kindness whose actions are an expression of His stewardship (Kholopa, 2016:69). Surprisingly enough, Wogaman (1970:239) argues that Protestant ethics portrays a half-truth; the true half is the importance of work in human fulfillment. The false half is the subordination to man to work and, worse yet, the attempt to establish whether or not people are deserving of what God has already given them.

Humans are social and spiritual beings by nature. By drawing on Protestant ethics in South Africa and African countries in general, a major problem has emerged, since only elite blacks remain rich and the majority poor are suppressed. Unfortunately, ignorance has led these unfair and unwelcome situations to develop and has prevented many from enjoying the fruits of the earth God has given to humankind (Kholopa, 2016:70).

XII. CONCLUSION

Ubuntu scholarship has gained momentum in the past two to three decades as African scholars have started taking a keen interest in their own interpretations of their cultures and world views. African communitarianism is informed by an ethic of reciprocity as community is seen not as a mere association of individuals whose interests are contingently congruent, but a communal social order whereby there is a sense of solidarity and members of the group have common interests, goals, and values (Gyekye, 1997: 42-45; Wiredu, 1998:320). In a pluralistic society such as South Africa, behaviours that are anti-traditional African, like xenophobia, rape, murder, etc, have posed challenges to Ubuntu and social ethics by lowering the esteem of the community, and as a consequence community members have developed an individualistic philosophy that runs counter to the many traditional African values (Mabovula, 2011:39).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

1. Berger, P.L & Buttiner, B. 1976. Sociology: A Geographical Approach. Harmondsworth: Penguin Books.
2. Broodryk, J. 2002. Ubuntu: Life lessons from Africa. Pretoria: Ubuntu School of Philosophy.
3. Bujo, B. 2001. Foundations of an African Ethics: Beyond the Universal Claims of Western Morality. New York: The Crossroad Publishing Company.
4. Chaplin, K. 2006. "The Ubuntu Spirit in African Communities", The Amy Biehl and South African Ubuntu Foundation.
5. Cornell, D. & Van Merle, K. 2005. 'Exploring ubuntu: Tentative reflections', African Human Rights Law Journal 5(2), 195-220.
6. Ela, J-M. 1988. My Faith as an African. Maryknoll: Orbis Books.
7. Eliastam, J.L.B. 2015. 'Exploring ubuntu discourse in South Africa: Loss, liminality and hope', Verbum et Ecclesia 36(2), Art. #1427, 8 pages. <http://dx.doi.org/10.4102/ve.v36i2.1427>
8. Enslin, P. & Horsthemke, K. 2004. 'Can ubuntu provide a model for citizenship education in African democracies?', Comparative Education 40(4), 545-558. <http://dx.doi.org/10.1080/0305006042000284538>
9. Eze, M.O. & Metz, T. 2016. 'Emergent Issues in African Philosophy: A Dialogue with Kwasi Wiredu'. Philosophia Africana, vol.17, No.2, Winter 2015/2016.
10. Gade, C.B.N. 2011. 'The historical development of the written discourses on Ubuntu', South African Journal of Philosophy, vol. 30(3), 303-329.
11. Gade, C.B.N. 2012. "What is Ubuntu? Different interpretations among South Africans of Descent", South African Journal of Philosophy 31(3), 484-503.
12. Gathogo, J.M. 2008a. 'Some expressions of African hospitality today', Scriptura 99, pages 275-287.
13. Gathogo, J.M. 2008b. 'African Philosophy as Expressed in the Concepts of Hospitality and Ubuntu'. Journal of Theology for Southern Africa. vol. 130. 39-53.
14. Gathogo, J.M. 2016. 'The Relevance and Influence of African Religion in Post-Apartheid South Africa and Beyond' – Part 1. <http://assiagency.com/ubuntu-an-african-ethics/> Date of access: 29 February 2020
15. Gooden, T.S & Wooldridge, B. 2011. 'Integrating Social Equity into the Core Human Resource Management Course' in Justice for All: Promoting Social Equity in Public Administration, Johnson, N.J. & Svara, J.H. eds. New York: M.E. Sharpe Inc. 247-264.
16. Gyekye, K. 1997. Tradition and Modernity: Philosophical Reflections on the African Experience. New York: Oxford University Press.
17. Haviland, W.A. 1990. Cultural Anthropology. Florida: Holt, Rinehart and Winston Inc.
18. Hernandez, W. 2015. Mere Spirituality: The Spiritual Life According to Henri Nouwen. Woodstock, Vermont: Skylight Paths Publishing.
19. Hountondji, P. 1995. African philosophy: Myth and reality. Paris: Francios Maspero.
20. Khomba, J.K. 2011. Redesigning the Balanced Scorecard Model: An African Perspective. Pretoria: University of Pretoria. (Thesis – PhD).
21. Khoza, R. 1994. "Ubuntu as African Humanism." Conference paper read at Ekhanya Promotions, Diepkloof Extension, Unpublished.
22. Kholopa, C.A. 2016. Promoting Ubuntu: Theological and ethical implications of a communitarian morality for South Africa. Leuven: Katholieke Universiteit. (Thesis – MAS).
23. Louw, D.J. 2001. 'Ubuntu and the challenges of multiculturalism in Post-Apartheid South Africa'. Quest: An African Journal of Philosophy, African Renaissance and Ubuntu Philosophy. 15-36.
24. Mabovula, N.N. 2011. The erosion of African communal values: a reappraisal of the African Ubuntu philosophy. Inkanyiso, Journal of Human and Social Sciences, 3(1), 38-47.
25. Magezi, V. 2017. "Ubuntu in Flames- Injustice and Disillusionment in Post-Colonial Africa: A Practical Theology for New "Liminal Ubuntu" and Personhood," in Practicing Ubuntu: Practical Theological Perspectives on Injustice, Personhood and Human Dignity, eds. Dreyer, J., Dreyer, Y., Foley, E. & Nel, M. 111-122. Zweigniederlassung Zurich: Deutsche Nationalbibliothek.
26. Mahaye, N.E. 'The philosophy of Ubuntu in Education', Unpublished paper, 18 July 2018.
27. Matolino, B. & Kwindingwi, W. 2013. "The end of ubuntu", South African Journal of Philosophy 32(2), 197-205. <http://dx.doi.org/10.1080/02580136.2013.817637>
28. Mawere, M. & van Stam. 2016. 'Ubuntu/Unhu as Communal Love: Critical Reflections on the Sociology of Ubuntu and Communal Life in sub-Saharan Africa', in Mawere, M. & Nhembachena, A. eds. Theory, Knowledge, Development and Politics:

What Role for the Academy in the Sustainability of Africa? Bamenda: Langaa RPCIG.

29. Mbigi, L. 1977. Ubuntu: The Dream in African Management. Randburg: Knowledge Resources.

30. Mbiti, J.S. 1969. African religions and philosophy. London: Heinemann.

31. Metz, T. 2007. 'Toward an African moral theory', The Journal of Political Philosophy 15(3), 321-341. <http://dx.doi.org/10.1111/j.1467-9760.2007.00280.x>

32. Metz, T. 2011. 'Ubuntu as a Moral Theory and Human Rights in South Africa' African Human Rights Law Journal, no. 11, 532-559.

33. Metz, T. 2017. An Overview of African Ethics. In Themes, Issues and Problems in African Philosophy, Ukpokolo, I.E. ed. DOI 10.1007/978-3-319-40796-8

34. Meylahn, J. 2017. "Practicing Ubuntu beyond, against or with Christian Texts," in Practicing Ubuntu: Practical Theological Perspectives on Injustice, Personhood and Human Dignity. Dreyer, J., Dreyer, Y., Foley, E. & Nel, M. eds. Zweigniederlassung Zurich: Deutsche Nationalbibliothek. 123-134

35. Mnyaka, M. & Motlhabi, M. 2005. The African concept of ubuntu/boho and its socio-moral significance. Black Theology, 3, 215-237.

36. Mofokeng, T. 1988. 'Black Christians, the Bible and Liberation', Journal of Black Theology 2, 38.

37. Motlhabi, M. 1988. Challenges to Apartheid toward a Moral National Resistance: African National Congress, Pan Africanist Congress, Black Consciousness Movement, Azanian People's Organisation, National Forum, United Democratic Front. Michigan: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company.

38. Msafiri, G.A. 2002. 'The church as a family model: Its strengths and weaknesses', Katongole, E. ed. African Theology Today. Scranton: The University of Scranton Press. pages 85-98.

39. Msengana, N.W. 2006. The significance of the concept 'Ubuntu' for educational management and leadership during democratic transformation in South Africa. Stellenbosch: University of Stellenbosch. (Thesis - PhD).

40. Musoke, M.E. 2018. Ontological foundation of traditional African morality. Nairobi, Kenya: Paulines Publications Africa.

41. Newman, E. 2007. Untamed Hospitality: Welcoming God and other Strangers. Grand Rapids, Michigan: Brazos Press.

42. Ogude, J. 2018. 'Introduction: Ubuntu and Personhood' In Ubuntu and Personhood, Ogude, J. ed. African World Press: New Jersey. 1-9

43. Shutte, A. 2001. Ubuntu: An ethic for a new South Africa. Pietermaritzburg: Cluster Publications.

44. Tempels, P. 1959. Bantu Philosophy, translated by King, C. Paris: Presence Africaine.

45. Tutu, D.M. 1999. No future without forgiveness. New York: Random House.

46. Tylor, E.B. 1990. 'Religion and Magic', in Haviland, W.A. ed. Cultural Anthropology. Chicago, London: Holt, Rinehart and Winston Inc.

47. West, G. 2016. 'The Bible in an African Christian: South African Black Theology', in Bongmba, E.K. ed. The Routledge Companion to Christianity in Africa. New York: Routledge.

48. Wiredu, K. 1992a. 'The African Concept of Personhood', in Flack, H. & Pellegrino, E. eds. African-American Perspectives on Biomedical Studies. Washington, DC: Georgetown University Press. 104-117.

49. Wiredu, K. 1992b. 'Moral Foundations of an African Culture', in Wiredu, K. & Gyekye, K. eds. Person and Community: Ghanaian Philosophical Studies, Volume I. Washington, DC: Council for Research in Values and Philosophy. 193-206.

50. Wiredu, K. 1996. Cultural Universals and Particulars: An African Perspective. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.

51. Wogaman, J.P. 1970. 'Ethical Guidelines for Income Guarantees' in Poverty in Affluence: The Social, Political and Economic Dimensions of Poverty in the United States. Will, R.E. & Vatter, H.G. eds. New York: Harcourt, Brace & World, Inc. 238-243.

